

Is REST normally stateless?

REST is stateless because according to its definition it HAS to be stateless. It means that each request must contain all the required information to interact with the server without the server need to store some context between requests. The same can be said about authentication: Each request holds the authentication information required for interacting with the server.